

Perplexities on Mars | Press-Kit

"The four young musicians (...) already demonstrate an impressive level of technical playing skills and convince through dynamic and group-related music-making full of strength, lyricism and imagination. In the two-year collaboration, the quartet managed to create its own band sound, to which both the original repertoire of own compositions and the interactive musical concept contribute. In the line-up with two saxophonists, double bass and drums, "Perplexities on Mars" ties in with great traditions of modern jazz. They show emotional devotion, great joy in playing and redesigned sound awareness."

Mars is the fourth planet in the solar system, counted from the sun, and the outer neighbor of the earth. It is one of the earth-like (terrestrial) planets. Mars is often referred to as the Red Planet. This color is due to iron oxide dust (rust) that has spread over the surface and the thin atmosphere. Its orange/red color and its fluctuations in brightness in the earthly night sky symbolise the colors of the Roman god of war: Mars.

This mythological "superstar" was the most important Roman deity and father of the twins Romulus and Remus, thus progenitor of the "Eternal City". It is probably due to the ironic point of view of the four musicians that the god and planet are in a state of perplexity.

The principle of hope (man's desire to find a second home on Mars) is ominous, just like the restless god of war, who donates fertility and health to people, animals and the fields, but was also responsible for their disaster and devastation. On a metaphorical level, these opposites describe the compositions and improvisations of the four musicians very well: high-energetic to melodically sensitive, complex to instinctive-sensitive.

Kunz, Hirth, Deller and Friedrich met each other in their studies at the Leipzig University of Music and have been playing together in various formations for many years. In the tradition of the jazz quartet with two saxophones (John Coltrane and Sonny Rollins, Lee Konitz and Wayne Marsh or Gerry Milligan and Stan Getz), but without a harmony instrument, the four musicians interact on an outstanding level which is rooted in a deep understanding of the common musical language. This also reflects in their compositions, in which every band member contributes its own musical thought. The challenge in this special line-up of a harmonious jazz quartet is the playful freedom. In a certain way, each individual is obliged to take on creative responsibility for the free space. "Perplexities on Mars" succeeds in filling this tense space between individual tones, individual improvisations and energetic rhythms in a refreshingly easy way that consistently follows their own musical instincts and intuitions.

In their long-term collaboration, the musicians have been able to develop their bandsound and present themselves to a greater audience beyond the city limits of Leipzig. Multiple concert tours included residences at the Regensburg Jazz Days, the Potsdam „City for One Night“ Festival and the 1st Berlin Jazz Festival.

“[...] the quartet 'Perplexities on Mars' [...] in which two tenor saxophonists (Christopher Kunz and Max Hirth) fought energetic battles, - creative jazz competitions that have a long tradition - but here they sounded as modern and bursting as they did rarely otherwise. ”
- Roland Spiegel; BR classic

„Then there was a really strong concert by the four young men who had actually met at the Leipzig University. With a good sense for dramaturgy, the playing of the two saxophonists Christopher Kunz and Maximilian Hirth interwoven in front of bassist Stephan Deller and drummer Tom Friedrich developed an astonishing intensity. Beyond the mere glimmer of the ancestors from Lester Young / Coleman Hawkins to John Coltrane / Pharoah Sanders, this new music created its own urgency.“ - Ulrich Steinmetzger, LVZ
